Excerpt: . had a niece living in London, a Mrs Frere, who had lately been left a widow. She was a sweet young creature, whose affections had been bound up in her husband with an intensity of devotion that, when given to the creature, becomes idol-worship. Mr Frere had died suddenly from a fall from his horse, and had left his young wife with two little boys desolate. After the sad occurrence, Minnie, who had never been very intimate with her cousin, sent the customary cards of condolence, and had been awaiting the return cards of thanks for inquiries before calling on her, as is usual in circles where even grief has its stated modes of fashion. None, however, had yet come; the fact was, poor Mrs Frere was too crushed by her sorrow to consider custom in any shape. Here, therefore, Minnie determined to...
