Excerpt: .of Luna, a town on the San Francisco river. The ruins along the Blue are located on terraces above the stream, near lands suitable for cultivation; they are rectangular stone pueblos, and are generally accompanied with square kivas. Numerous small pueblos are also found on the creeks flowing into the Blue, but there are few caves, because the rock is not of the character to permit this kind of erosion. There is abundant water in this valley, and the climate is equable, so that agriculture could have been carried on by the Indians with the greatest returns. Although the valuable farming land was limited the pueblos are, in the main, large and from various evidences were long inhabited. From Clifton, Ariz., along the San Francisco to a short distance above the mouth of the Blue there are a few ruins of the rectangular pueblo type, which are noted under nos. 26-32 in the following pages. Fig. 9. Sketch map of Blue river, Arizona, showing location of ruins. No. 26. Pueblo.--This ruin is located on the bluff overlooking the town hospital of Clifton, Ariz. Rough volcanic rocks almost cover the site, and among them the rooms were built without attempt at orderly arrangement. Some of the dwellings were formed by picking out loose masses of lava from a small area and piling them up around the sides to build the walls. The pottery is chiefly brown, and consists of bowls with fillet rims and vessels...
