Not illustrated. 1824 Excerpt: . affording an extent of unoccupied territory, in which the labour of man, assisted by a genial and healthy climate, would produce an early and abundant return. If it be true, as I apprehend must be admitted, that pauperism principally arises from a redundant labouring population, it is evident that nothing can remove it but the reduction of that redundancy; and that it is so, appears from this fact, that now in the year 1823, in the eighth year of peace, with an acknowledged state of general prosperity and improvement in our commerce, manufactures, and agriculture, with plentiful harvests and cheap bread, there has still been no material reduction effected in the amount of rate assessed and expended in the relief of the poor; and if that amount be compared with the price of bread, there has been no reduction whatever, but an increase. In order therefore to remove pauperism and reduce the poor s rate, the redundant population must be reduced. This can only be done by emigration, and that to an extent commensurate with the redundancy. The emigration of the surplus labouring population of England, consisting, as will appear, of several hundred thousand souls, is a matter of the most serious importance, as it respects the labouring part of the community, and the VOL. II. Q prosperity of the state; as well as in reference to the sources and funds from which the expence can be derived; the country to which it will be prudent...
